THE POLITICS OF CIVIL SOCIETY

Big society, small government?

Fred Powell
In my humble study I am the most virtuous …
I strum my plain old zither, read Buddhist sutra,
No music to grate my ears
No office to tire my mind and soul.

My Humble Study by Liu Yuxi (772–847)
Contents

Acknowledgements vi

Introduction 1

one Doublethink: the ‘Big Society, Small Government’ debate 7
two The renaissance of civil society 31
three Modernity, civil society and civic virtue 63 four Radical civil society, early social movements and the socialisation of the state 95
five Nietzsche’s revenge: totalitarian big society 119 six Rights talk, new social movements and civic revolts 143 seven American exceptionalism, multicultural civil society and Plato’s noble lie 173 eight Global civil society: myth or reality? 197

References 215
Index 229
Acknowledgements

In preparing this book, I am much indebted to four research colleagues, Donal Guerin, Martin Geoghegan, Margaret Scanlon and Katherina Swirak, with whom I had the good fortune to work on three major research projects on civil society in Ireland that resulted in three books: Civil Society and Social Policy (Powell and Guerin, 1997), The Politics of Community Development (Powell and Geoghegan, 2004), Youth Policy, Civil Society and the Modern Irish State (Powell et al, 2012). Their intellectual collaboration has helped to shape my understanding of civil society. I would also like to thank Andrea de Dominicis and Silvia Lombardi of the Centro Italiano di Solidarietà di Roma for including me in a European Union study that encompassed the third sector in the Czech Republic, Denmark, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Slovenia, Spain and Sweden. In addition, I am grateful to Anna Kwak and Marek Rymsza of the University of Warsaw for facilitating my visit to Poland during the 1990s and the Council of Europe for funding a ten-country study on the socioeconomic status of youth during 2007–08, which enabled me to link the experience of civil society to childhood. I would also like to thank Demos for generously furnishing me with its relevant reports during a visit to London. Particular thanks are due to the late Jo Campling for her advice and support in producing this book. Finally, I am much indebted to Rebecca Jeffers, Sinead Hanley, Orla McDonald and Maura O’Brien for their patience and diligence in the production of the manuscript, my School Manager, Fionnuala O’Connor, for keeping me eternally organised and, finally, my family for their support, understanding and love, and particularly my late father, Dr Anthony Powell, for his inspirational belief in humanity.